People with developmental coordination disorder (DCD) are known to show an impaired ability to identify objects using gestural information. This study investigated the impact of corrective training on the performance of children with DCD by measuring the object identity effect (OIE). An individual, experimental design was used to evaluate the impact of a 10-session corrective intervention in 34 children between 7 and 12 years of age with DCD. The OIE was measured using a pointing task and an endogenous orienting task before and after the training. The experimental group received a 10-session corrective intervention during which they were asked to point correctly at three target objects presented simultaneously with four distractors.
