The use of air suspension systems for vehicles has become increasingly popular because it has been found to significantly reduce wear and tear on conventional mechanical systems in certain applications. There are currently two general types of air suspension systems. The first type uses one or more air springs to provide a working air chamber between a vehicle frame and the body of the vehicle and a reservoir on the vehicle frame containing the same type of air. The air springs and reservoir are in fluid communication to keep the air pressure in the working air chamber at a constant level. If it is desired to adjust the vehicle height, a blower is used to move air from the reservoir to the working air chamber through a control valve which maintains the air pressure in the working air chamber at a constant level. The spring deflection is proportional to the air pressure. The second type of air suspension system is a dual air suspension system. In a dual air suspension system, two air springs are used for supporting the vehicle frame on the vehicle body. The air springs are each located between a lower portion of the vehicle frame and the body and an upper portion of the
