Skin cutting devices are used in the medical industry, such as doctors and nurses, for various purposes. One function of skin cutting devices is to cut or incise the skin to allow access to a wound. In particular, the device is typically used to cut the skin to allow medical personnel to stitch up a patient's skin after they have treated the wound. The procedure is typically performed with either a scalpel or some type of saw to create a wound. Typically, a scalpel is used. The problem with using a scalpel is that it tends to leave a sharp edge that may hurt the patient's skin. Additionally, a scalpel can be difficult to sharpen and dull the edge of the blade. As a result, doctors and nurses spend a great deal of time sharpening the scalpel and ensuring that it is clean and sterilized to prevent the spread of disease. The present invention is designed to solve these and other problems associated with the cutting of medical skin and more specifically the problem of cutting skin to allow access to a wound. It is an object of this invention to provide a skin cutting device that will cut skin without leaving a sharp edge. A further object of this invention is to provide a device that will easily and safely sharpen the cutting edge of a skin-cutting device. Gait disturbances are the most frequent motor symptoms experienced by patients with Parkinson's disease (PD). The mechanisms leading to the impairment of gait are multiple, including bradykinesia, rigidity, postural instability, and gait freezing. Gait pathology is responsive to medical treatment in early PD, but is often refractory to levodopa therapy at later stages of the disease. The most commonly used medical treatment for gait disturbance in patients with PD is botulinum toxin A (BTX-A), which has been demonstrated in several studies to be an effective and safe treatment with a favorable adverse event profile.
