That's the message business professors at the University of Oregon's School of Business are trying to convey to executives considering life-ending choices. The story behind the research project – published in the Journal of Consumer Research – is a little offbeat. It started with a high school student in Oakland, Calif., who for the National High School Record Shop wanted to know how to win the real world's coveted "Most Valuable Player" award. As Mark R. Cohen, professor of marketing at the school, tells it, the student had an inkling that the way to stand out was to write a perfect college essay. But how does a 17-year-old in a business class help a community college professor devise a way to increase essay writing skill? "I had a student who was studying to be a high school teacher," Cohen explains, "and she saw we were looking for an entryway into business. She thought it would be important for students to know how to write a good business paper. So she decided to put together a program to help students become better writers, beginning with a writing exercise on how to critique an essay. Then, as it developed, we put together a curriculum for four short courses with an emphasis on helping students write better business papers." The courses, which were offered on campus last spring, each taught a different aspect of paper writing. Topics included how to divide an essay into sections and how to write a lead, body and conclusion. Students also learned the tricks of the trade from successful business school applicants and editors of Harvard Business Review, MIT Sloan Management Review and UC Berkeley Business School's leading study-abroad journal. Cohen says that sales of business texts more than doubled in the first month of the program. At the conclusion of the semester, he says, students scored an average of 50.5 on a writing score. That's just two points behind the
