Diuretic therapy in the treatment of edema in the neonate. The treatment of parenteral edema in the neonate with diuretics is reviewed. The data strongly suggest that the first-line agents for treatment are furosemide and the thiazides. The efficacy of the thiazides and furosemide in edema of the lung is greater than that in edema of the skin. Two different classes of adjunctive therapies are reviewed. Treatment of peripheral edema in the newborn with parenteral diuretics and furosemide in combination with intravenous albumin may be indicated. Treatment of skin edema with topical furosemide with or without silver sulfadiazine may be a treatment of choice.
