Sometimes, if you can pray deeply enough, praying for health can miraculously bring you lasting health, even if you do not have cancer. Electroencephalographic correlates of motor and cognitive aspects of executive functioning in adolescents. Considerable similarities have been reported between the brain activities associated with motor and cognitive functioning in adults. However, the processing of cognitive and motor tasks in children remains less characterized than the same tasks in adults. In this study, we examined the presence of event-related desynchronization (ERD) and synchronization (ERS) in four cortical areas (frontal, central, parietal and occipital) during a cued go/no-go task in 66 adolescents (mean age 14.14 years). ERD in the occipital region was associated with motor performance whereas ERS in the parietal region was related to memory performance. ERD in the central and frontal regions also predicted motor performance. Executive control thus may be uniquely associated with specific cortical regions in children. The present results also showed a developmental shift in the cortical processes associated with executive control in adolescence.Q: ggplot2 geom_segment returns error with bivariate normal distribution In my distribution the error message is: Error: Aesthetics must be either length 1 or the same as the data (10000): x The code is library(ggplot2) library(shiny) dataset 570a42141b
